Human Resources has 15 employees and an opening for a training coordinator. The department takes care of worker's compensation claims, recruiting and benefits.

One of the challenges facing HR currently is the number of open positions versus the number of applicants. She said it's been a challenge finding employees.

During Covid, employees utilized counseling offered by the county. An estimated 600-700 employees took advantage of some kind of Covid leave at the height of the pandemic.

Ms. Russell said training has been a focus this year. The department has arranged leadership classes for employees as well as skills training and opportunities such as Spanish and sign language. The department also arranged a workplace respect and bias training course for all employees.

Ms. Russell said her department also handles a lot of legal issues such as employee lawsuits. She works with internal and external attorneys when necessary. She said her department also stays on top of new legislation at the county, state and federal levels.

The HR department also has been transitioning to a paperless system.

The county has roughly 1,800 employees who stay with the county an average of 7.3 years. Ms. Russell said that average has gone down a little bit because a lot of people are retiring. The average age of employees is about 33.
